General Health Assessments For Employers And Insurers

Before making employment decisions today, you need all the facts about applicants before deciding which ones you will hire. For years, employers large and small have been asking about prospective new employees' education and work background. The trend in recent years is to also conduct criminal background checks and drug screening tests. All of these issues are taken into consideration before the successful applicant is selected.

Yet many employers still overlook one important area—the overall general health of the applicant. Wouldn't you like a neutral third party to determine if the applicant is physically able to do the work before you spend hundreds or perhaps thousands of dollars on training? While federal and state laws prevent employers from discriminating against those with certain disabilities, employers are allowed to test for physical fitness. Some employers postpone a general health assessment of new employees until after they have been hired. Either way, you know each person's physical limitations and that information can save you down time and money with workers' compensation and health insurance premiums.

Allen Home Care Services, Inc. can conduct a general health assessment by one of our nurses either at your worksite or our office, whichever is most convenient for you and/or your employee.

Current employees would welcome a general health assessment on an annual basis to help screen for potential health problems, too. We can draw blood for laboratory testing for drugs, as well as for diabetes and cholesterol screenings. This new “employee benefit” will add great value to your company's employee moral without breaking the bank in the process.

Many insurers now require general health assessments before finalizing coverage on applicants.

Our staff of highly skilled nurses are experts at assessing a person's health with a rigorous screening test that can be customized to your specifications.
